

INDIGENOUS INTERVENTIONS: RESHAPING ARCHIVES & MUSEUMS

artists, archeologists, curators & scholars discuss how Native people engage with & challenge archives and museums through art, community-based practice, scholarship & curation

Taking our own institutions as a starting point, we specifically consider the materials donated by Edward E. Ayer, whose collection of Indigenous cultural material is a significant portion of the Field Museum's and the Newberry Library's holdings.

While most scholarly research has focused on highlighting Ayer's contributions in "salvaging" Indigenous culture, Indigenous activists, visual artists, anthropologists, musicians, writers, and leaders have also intervened in the use of and access to these collections throughout the 19th, 20th, and 21st centuries.

This symposium privileges these interventions, highlighting how Indigenous peoples have reshaped archives and museums to reflect the needs and interests of their communities rather than those of public institutions.
